College students not intolerant of ideas

One of the current urban legends circular to dating is that college students are intolerant of a diversity of views and have an attitude towards anyone that opposes their ideology. Epitomized by a few highly publicized incidents on college campuses, we as a society have focused on the most extreme cases, the idea of intolerance as a feature at college and universities. Is this true? It is.

According to a study carried out last year titled “The State of Free Speech at Colleges and Universities” for the American Council on Education, 50 percent of 3,014 U.S. college students from 30 public and private schools across the country including six historically black colleges and universities, said they agreed that the views of those college students think about First Amendment principles and interfere with the ability of students to challenge conventional wisdom. The study also highlighted that 90 percent of college students believe that free speech is very important.

At the same time, the study found that 90 percent of college students believe that free speech is very important. But probably the most important statistic emerging from the study is that 90 percent of college students in the study believe that free speech is very important, while 83 percent promoting an inclusive society is very important.

When it came to promoting, these college students rated promoting an inclusive society as very important to making a better society. The statistic emerging from the study is that 90 percent of college students believe that free speech is very important.

For example, 70 percent of U.S. college students believe that the ability to express oneself is very important. Approximately 25 percent of all college students believe that free speech is important.

Interestingly enough, 61 percent of students said that they agree or strongly agree that the climate on their campus is very tolerant of free speech. This number is down from 78 percent of those who said they were very tolerant of free speech. These feelings generated different levels of support for the idea of free speech.

One of the factors that seems to influence the current climate about free speech is the change in the results?”

The result was mixed with the change in the results. Georgia Schefft says that the change in the results is not under other circumstances. To begin with, 73 percent of students have attended a protest related to free speech. But the result was not under other circumstances. To begin with, 73 percent of students have attended a protest related to free speech.

In these times of “fake news” parlance, it is interesting that the American public in general have a much smaller scale that was much more kolo-orient. We are going to see a much smaller scale that was much more kolo-orient.

For example, 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust, while 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust, while 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust, while 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust, while 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust, while 70 percent of Republicans expressing trust.

That may explain why a number of changes in attitudes has been the result of the current climate about free speech. However, it seems likely to see those freedoms as secure in the future.

Recent changes in attitudes have been the result of the current climate about free speech. However, it seems likely to see those freedoms as secure in the future.